All Scripture references in the dictionary have been indexed, as well as most references to extrabiblical literature (with the exception of the Classics).

David Townsley holds the M.A.T.S. degree from Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary. He is at present marketing manager, academic books, Zondervan Publishing House.

Russell Bjork holds the M.S. degree from M.I.T. and the M.Div. from Gordon-Conwell Seminary. He is Professor of Computer Science at Gordon College, Massachusetts.

Preface

During my first year in seminary, both the need for this Scripture Index and the possibility of producing it as an "extracurricular project" were suggested to me by a good friend and classmate, Paul Mirecki. I began the work almost immediately but soon realized that it would be a long time before I could hope to complete the gargantuan job of manually collating thousands of citations.

The project was ushered into the computer age, however, through the unique talents and generous collaboration of Russell Bjork. I am grateful for his creative and careful work and his willingness to stick with the project despite unforeseen delays and an increasingly demanding teaching schedule.

Two professors, David M. Scholer and J. Ramsey Michaels, whose love of Scripture and other ancient literature and dedication to the highest standards of scholarship provided an inspiration for this work, are due a special thanks. It was in response to an assignment made by David M. Scholer to prepare an extensive collection of extrabiblical passages that parallel Scripture passages that Russ originally developed a program to collate the citations. Thanks to a request by J. Ramsey Michaels for me to prepare a Scripture index for one of his books as part of my responsibility as a student assistant to him, I had the opportunity to approach Russ about developing similar programs for other uses and to pave the way for the present project.

I am particularly indebted to my wife, Daryl, for several suggestions that greatly improved the effeciency of collecting the citations and ensured the accuracy of the data that was entered into the computer. Her help and encouragement were invaluable resources for me.

It has been my good fortune to have an editor who is also a friend and a co-worker. I appreciate the care and patience with which Ed van der Maas has worked to get this ponderous and tedious project into its final form. The work has benefited from his suggestions at several points.

Finally, it is my hope that the Scripture Index will achieve its intended purpose: to make The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology both more accessible and more useful to pastors, students, and laypersons everywhere as they endeavor to read, to understand, and to proclaim God's Word.

DAVID L. TOWNSLEY

Introduction

The Scripture Index was intended from the outset to be as inclusive as possible. For that reason, the reader should not expect to find a substantive discussion of a given passage every time that passage is cited. Secondary citations can, however, lead the reader to discussions of related passages and provide many "fresh trails."

The Index to Selected Extrabiblical Literature also opens the way for the serious reader to benefit from the wealth of background and illustrative material so important to a proper understanding and appreciation of the New Testament. Used in conjunction with the Scripture Index, it can provide yet another way of cross-referencing related Scripture passages. Used alone, it facilitates the study of the extrabiblical literature in its own right.

In certain Old Testament passages, the verse numbers of the English versions differ from those of the Septuagint (LXX) and/or the Hebrew Masoretic text. An asterisk (*) following a reference indicates that such a numbering variation was noted in one or more of the articles citing the passage. The asterisks are included as a reminder to the reader that the pursuit of a given verse will be affected at these points, depending upon whether an English or an ancient language text is being consulted.

The preparation of the Scripture Index has brought to light a number of citation errors. The Index lists the corrected citations. A dagger (†) following an entry alerts the reader to check the Errata on pages 319–20, since on one or more of the pages given for that entry an incorrect reference will be found.
